WÖHR + BAUER

I have for some time wanted to investigate ideas of liquid or ephemeral objects in public space, of drift and non-normative sites, unpredictable encounters and our sense of community, of the emotional city. The place to do this is Berlin. With a team from my studio and a rented lorry, I carefully placed driftwood that had been collected from the Northern Icelandic coasts across the city. I found spaces that I thought might generate small frictional dialogues; spaces where the trunks would be perceived as momentary thresholds, offering subtle resistance to our too pragmatic and automated relations with our surroundings. It was a way of adding a small narrative to the multiple stories-so-far of the city. — Olafur Eliasson
